Dear Mr. Price,

It will be a happy day when I run out of opponents, for then the job will have been done.

I've got a small but regular commercial publisher for the Manchester book. I've had to lay it aside for a few weeks, but I've got about 25% of it drafted and in the very few minutes I can take from a project that I think will interest you when I can tell you about it I keep plugging away.

Notice the stuff from New Orleans? You've read most of it!

I am very interested in a foundation. A lawyer who wrote me after the Nizer program also has the same idea and says he has had some experience in establishing them. I've just had an unsolicited $200 contribution from a stranger I take to be a working man. I wrote and thanked him but asked him if he were certain that he and his family would not be doing without things they might really want to have. I told him I'd not cash the check, to think it over and let me know. He bounced right back with a letter that wet my eyes and insists I use it, which I can and shall. But you can see how this leads to the question of a foundation. I'd like these people to at least get a tax benefit from such kindness. I've had less than $100 from others, including something he sent earlier.

In a rush, thanks a lot. If you are ill, get well quick, soon and totally.

Regards,
